the necessities of a growing business. But he had deceived her all the time, he had lied in her cars and smiled, oh, how tenderly, in her eyes during all that period of ignoble action.

Now he was safe in jail-they told her that, these gossips-and the other woman he had so cruelly wronged was lying, cold and silent, in her casket, with her infant folded closely to her breast. He had killed her, they said, but no one knew the circumstances, as the whole case rested on the simple fact that he had been with her the evening before and was the last guilt in his soul as he rose at last and person seen in her living presence.

But in that momentary hesitation her plan of mercy was conceived. With the dead girl's face still vividly before her eyes, she hurried to where they were keeping her husband. At first when she saw him he was still the man she loved, the man whose name she bore and whose slightest wish it was her only joy to pamper. There were tears in her eyes, tears in her voice and tears in her heart when she asked of him the fatal question.

"Charlie," she whispered fondly, "swear to me it is not true, this hideous story that they tell about you Tell me that I am still your wife, that you love me and that this other fiendish thing is but the wild conception of our tattling neighbors Tell meshe began again, but stopped as she saw his guilty features.

There was fear in his eyes and tried to face her.

"It is all quite true," he said cau-tiously. "She was my mistress and I killed her in a fit of passion. I have wronged you and I have got to die, unless-" and he paused for a moment's breath, "unless you forgive me and will try to save me."
